IOSR Journal of Humanities and Social Science (IOSR-JHSS)
Volume 31, Issue 11, Series 3 (November, 2026) 47-52
e-ISSN: 2279-0837, p-ISSN: 2279-0845.
www.iosrjournals.org

The arrival of Europeans in Umuofia disrupt African Culture in Chinua Achebe' s Things fall apart.

Abstract
This article examines the sociopolitical disruption caused by European colonization in Chinua Achebe's novel Things Fall Apart, which is focused specifically on the consequences of the arrival of British missionaries and colonial officials in the Igbo village of Umuofia. Descriptive method and documentary technique were used so that we could reach the goal of the study. The article explores the dissolution of traditional governance structures, the imposition of a foreign judicial system, and the broader implications for indigenous autonomy. The study argues that the colonial presence catalyzed a forced evolution of governance in Umuofia, one that marked a profound departure from consensus and based tribal leadership to authoritarian colonial rule. The analysis highlights the cultural dissonance and erosion of communal autonomy that marked the colonial transition and contends for a deeper understanding of how imposed legal frameworks can disrupt indigenous social orders.
Keys words: Europeans arrival, disrupt, African culture, things fall apart.

Date of Submission: 09-11-2026 Date of Acceptance: 21-11-2026

I. INTRODUCTION

In Things Fall Apart, Chinua Achebe documents the cultural collision between traditional Igbo society and British colonial forces. What is Central to this narrative is the shift from indigenous legal and governmental practices to those enforced by the colonial regime. This paper investigates how these new institutions differed from the ones they replaced, focusing on their structural organization, principles of justice, and sociopolitical legitimacy.

The same reality is found in The River Between of Ngugi wa Thiong'o, which explores how colonialism and Christianity divide Kenyan community. Like Things Fall Apart, it shows both destruction and transformation, with characters caught between traditional beliefs and new ways.

The late 19th-century was dominated by colonization of Africa by European powers led to the imposition of foreign political, economic, and religious systems upon indigenous societies. Achebe's Things Fall Apart (1958) serves as a counter and narrative to colonial literature, documenting the Igbo people's cultural and the destructive impact of British colonialism.

The novel is a nuanced portrayal of pre-colonial Igbo society and its eventual unraveling under British colonization. Central to this transformation is the arrival of Europeans in Umuofia, bringing with them a new religion, culture, and a new form of government.

Pre-colonial Igbo society was marked by a decentralized political structure without kings or formal state apparatus. Governance was embedded in clan and village councils, where decisions were made through consensus and guided by customs, proverbs, and the authority of elders. Justice was restorative rather than punitive, emphasizing reconciliation, compensation, and the maintenance of social harmony. Religious beliefs, ancestral authority, and the role of oracles provided spiritual legitimacy to these systems.

In A Grain of Wheat, Ngugi wa Thiong'o deals with Kenya's struggle for independence. He questions whether political change truly brings liberation or simply replaces one form of oppression with another.

The theme of the novel is started clearly on page160 he has put a knife on the things that held us together and we have fallen apart. With the arrival of the white man and his new religion and administration, traditional society' cracks and weaknesses, hitherto concealed by the common fear of the ancestors and the gods, break open and once- stable community collapses. In order to impress on the reader, the tragedy of its collapse the narrator devotes great skill in evoking his society as it used to be and this is one of the reasons for the novel's enduring appeal those who open this novel hoping to find a description of noble savagery where the tensions of modern Western society do not exist, are likely to be disappointed. Umuofia society is proud, dignified, stable, because it is governed by a complicated system of customs and traditions extending

This work of arts has been chosen to show that neo- colonialism is in fact killing of killing of two birds with one stone. It shows that how white men indirectly started working on colonizing the minds of people.

The westerners subjugate the native norms and values by rejecting native gods and erasing the ancestral spirit and divine power of cultural society of umuofia, one may read:

- there are no other gods, said Mr. Brown
    - Chuckwu is the only God and all others are false.
    - You carve a piece of wood like that one (he pointed at the rafters from which Akunna' s carved Ikenge hung) and you call it a god. But it still a piece of wood. P. 162

This study aims at investigates the mechanisms by which colonial forces displaced indigenous authority and installed British imperial interest's system. It explores the dynamics of cultural disruption catalyzed by European arrival in Umuofia, a fictional Igbo village.

II. METHODOLOGY OF THE WORK

This study is purely descriptive. This method has been coupled with documentary technique which has provided for all textual resources that have contributed to materialize the shape and the content of this article. It has been also enriched by literature from different researchers, who have illustrated the work and consolidated the methodology.

Also Textual Approach was used as well. This approach enables me to get the basic data from the narrative.to mean the critical discuss of Things Fall Apart. quotations were taken from the novel to support different points within the analysis. Such as focusing on scenes which depicted traditional Igbo governance, district commissioners, British law courts. And finally Comparative Approach was used to present the two system that to say indigenous and colonial legal systems.

I used close reading technique, which is a strategy in which a reader has to read and rereads short, complex text in order to improved comprehension. In literary criticism close reading is the careful, sustained interpretation of a brief passage of the text close reading technique helped me to get to understand the true message conveyed by the novel things fall apart in which I found The arrival of Europeans in Umuofia disrupt African Culture as the main theme.

2. EUROPEAN ARRIVAL AND CULTURAL DISRUPTION

The arrival of Europeans in Okonkwo's village, Umuofia, marks a pivotal moment in Chinua Achebe's novel Things Fall Apart. This encounter between traditional Igbo society and European colonial forces brings profound changes, especially in governance and law. These changes not only disrupt the existing social order but also introduce new structures that challenge indigenous authority and belief systems.

In the novel, the changes brought by colonialism and Christian missionaries are portrayed as complicated rather than simply good or bad. Narrator doesn't paint a black and white picture; instead, he captures the complexity of cultural transformation and its deeply human consequences.

a. Why the Changes Are Complicated:

- Destruction of Igbo Traditions: The arrival of the British and their institutions (religion, government, education) disrupts the traditional Igbo way of life. Practices, social structures, and beliefs that had functioned for generations begin to erode. For example, Okonkwo, the protagonist, feels alienated and powerless in the face of these changes, eventually leading to his tragic death.
- Opportunities and Empowerment: At the same time, the new systems offer some people especially marginalized individuals within the Igbo society (like outcasts or those lower in social rank) new opportunities. Education, for instance, allows some to rise in status and think differently about their place in the world.
- Cultural Clash and Misunderstanding: Much of the tragedy in the novel comes from a lack of mutual understanding. Neither the colonizers nor the colonized fully comprehend each other, leading to conflict and misjudgment. This gray area is central to Achebe's theme change is not inherently evil or good; it's how it is managed and experienced that makes it painful or liberating.
- Through the establishment of Christian missions, Western education, and British law, colonial powers undermined the existing order.

A clear example is seen when the egwugwu are publicly humiliated and their sacred house is burned. The colonizers establish a "District Commissioner" and introduce foreign laws that often disregard or conflict with Igbo customs. For instance, the imprisonment of village elders for resisting colonial rule showcases the erosion of traditional justice

- With the arrival of the British, a new kind of government begins to take shape. Colonial administrators install a formal system with appointed officials, a court, and armed enforcement. This centralized system undermines the authority of traditional leaders like the egwugwu (ancestral spirits) and weakens communal decision making.
- The arrival of Christian missionaries, followed by British colonial administrators, introduced a starkly different value system. Missionaries, such as Mr. Brown and later Mr. Smith, brought with them not just religion but a belief in European superiority and the need to "civilize" the natives. Their efforts were quickly followed by colonial agents who set up a courthouse and introduced a government that was foreign and alienating.

– yes said Akunna. It is indeed a piece of wood . the tree from which it came was made by Chukwu, as indeed all minor gods were. But he made them for his messengers so that we could approach him through them. It is like yourself. You are the head of your church

- No , protested Mr. Brown. The head of my church is God himself.
- I know said Akunna, but there must be a head in this world among the men. Somebody like yourself must be the head here.
- The head of my church in that sense is in England.
- That is exactly what I am saying. The head of your church is in your country. He has sent you here as his messenger. And you have also appointed your own messengers and servants. P. 162

……. Or let me take another example, the District Commissioner. he is sent by your king. they have a queen, said the interpreter on his own account. Your queen sends her messenger, the District Commissioner. p. 163

…….in this way Mr. Brown leant a good deal about the religion of the clan and he came to the conclusion that a frontal attack on it would not succeed. And so he built a school and a little hospital in Umuofia . he went from family to family begging people to send their children to his school. But at first they only sent their slaves or sometimes their lazy children. p 163

The new government introduces written laws, fixed punishments, and missionary courts that ignore traditional values. Many villagers are confused and disempowered. While some, like Nwoye (Okonkwo's son), embrace the new system and convert to Christianity, others resist, like Okonkwo, who ultimately takes his own life in despair at the loss of his world.

- What are you doing here? Obierika had asked when after many difficulties the missionaries had allowed him to speak to the boy.
- I am one of them replied Nwoye.
- How is your father? Obierika asked, not knowing what else to say.
- I don't know. He is not my father, said Nwoye, unhappily
- And so Obierika went to Mbanta to see his friend. And he found that Okonkwo did not wish to speak about Nwoye . p131

This shift weakened ancestral authority and spiritual unity. Yaa G. (2016) argues that the long lasting effects of colonization and slavery on two branches of a family. It shows how historical change affects generations, with both suffering and resilience passed down.

- In Things Fall Apart the writer looks at the post-colonial that exists between Western missionaries and umuofia' s society. The replacement of indigenous conflict and resolution practices with British courts alienated Igbo elders and compromised community autonomy.

- Sociopolitical Fragmentation: Colonial rule manipulated internal divisions and redefined power dynamics, favoring converts and collaborators over traditional leaders.

Tyson L, (2006) contends colonialist ideology was a pervasive force in the British schools established in the colonies to inculcate British culture and values in the indigenous peoples and thereby forestall rebellion. It' s difficult to rebel against a system or a people one has been programmed, over several generations, to consider superior. The plan was extremely successful and resulted in the creation of colonial subjects, colonized persons who did not resist colonial subjugation because they were taught to believe in British superiority and therefore in their own inferiority. Many of these individuals tried to imitate their colonizers as much as possible, in dress speech, behavior and lifestyle. This feeling of being caught between cultures of belonging to neither rather to both. To be un homed is to feel not at home even in your own home because you are not at home in yourself: your cultural identity crisis has made you a psychological refugee, so to speak

Achebe contrasts this indigenous system with the rigid, alien justice system brought by British colonialists. The arrival of the colonial government, with its foreign laws and court system, undermines the authority of the elders and replaces traditional governance with indirect rule and mission-based authority. This shift erodes the clan's autonomy and creates internal divisions, symbolizing the broader cultural disintegration brought by colonialism.

Europeans arrive in Africa where they have established themselves, the arrivals of Europeans were just for destroying African culture, beauty, languages and so on. In fact, they are considered as superior to us as they brought religion in Africa as if there were no religion in Africa. Also, as if African did not know God in their life. In west people' mind, it is remaining that African do not have the same value of human being, they are indigenous people whose' s mind must be work on it. It is all so them how dominated black people.

Achebe's narrative critiques both the brutality and the subtle coercion of colonialism. By portraying the Igbo world in its full complexity, he resists colonial representations of African societies as primitive. The novel reveals that cultural disruption was not a mere byproduct of colonialism but it was its strategy.

III. IMPOSITION OF COLONIAL GOVERNMENT

The colonial government established a judiciary that supplanted the traditional role of the egwugwu, who represented ancestral justice. The District Commissioner, representing the British Crown, assumed ultimate authority, enforcing laws that did not align with Igbo customs. This shift in power was not negotiated but imposed, often with violence and coercion, as demonstrated in the imprisonment of tribal leaders and public executions.

With the advent of British colonial rule, indigenous institutions were systematically replaced by European-style legal and administrative systems. The British Introduced District Commissioners, warrant chiefs, and codified laws enforced through courts. These institutions prioritized state authority and written law over oral traditions and communal decision-making. The judicial

IV. THE ROLE OF RELIGION AND THE ORACLE

Spiritual authority is intertwined with political leadership in Umuofia. The Oracle of the Hills and Caves, called Agbala, holds immense power in guiding the community. People consult the Oracle on everything from personal matters to war declarations. The priestesses and spiritual leaders, though not political leaders in the conventional sense, influence the clan's decisions through divine authority:

The woman with whom she talked was called chielo. She was the priestess of Agbla, the oracle of the hills and the caves. in ordinary life Chielo was a widow with two children. p. 44

The Earth goddess (Ani) is also central, especially in legal matters and any crime against her laws, like murder or incest, is seen as a serious offense requiring cleansing or exile: It is illustrated by this passage

- Every year he said sadly before I put any crop in the earth, I sacrifice a cock to Ani, the owner of all land. it is law of fathers. I also kill a cock at the shrine of Ifejioku, the god of yams. P 34

V. TRADITIONAL GOVERNANCE IN UMUOFIA

Before European contact, Umuofia was governed through a decentralized system of elders, titled men, and communal consensus. Authority was rooted in tradition, ancestry, and spiritual beliefs, with the Oracle and the egwugwu playing significant judicial roles. Okonkwo, a central character in the narrative, rose to prominence within this structure, embodying its values of strength, discipline, and masculinity. Ngugi wa Thiong'o in Decolonizing the Mind, Offers insights into how colonial languages and systems replaced indigenous structures and ways of thinking.

At the heart of Umuofia's governance is a collective leadership model, centered around a council of elders. These elders, chosen for their wisdom, experience, and moral standing, are responsible for making decisions that affect the clan. They resolve disputes, interpret customs, and provide guidance on complex issues. Every adult male in the village also has a voice in community affairs through clan assemblies, where issues are debated publicly and consensus is often sought. This participatory system is key to Igbo democracy.

Leadership and influence in Umuofia are closely linked to a system of titles. Men can earn titles such as the Ozo through personal achievement, wealth, and community service. The title system not only marks social standing but also determines one's role in governance. For example, titled men often serve as judges in disputes and have a higher degree of influence in decision making processes. This merit based system promotes hard work and social responsibility.

Justice in Umuofia is community based and restorative. Disputes are brought before the elders or titled men, who act as judges in community gatherings. These judgments are guided by customs and oral traditions rather than written laws. The goal is usually to restore harmony rather than to punish. Even in cases of serious transgressions, such as Okonkwo's accidental killing of a clansman, the punishment is exile rather than death a reflection of the emphasis on balance and atonement. So the justice in Umuofia is based on three points which are:

Decision Making: Igbo systems favored consensus and community involvement; colonial systems centralized authority in the hands of appointed officials.

Justice Philosophy: Restorative justice in Igbo culture emphasized balance and restoration. Colonial courts implemented retributive justice with a focus on punishment.

Social Role of Law: In Igbo society, law was integrated into social life and moral education. Under colonial rule, law became a tool of control and often served foreign economic and political interests process became adversarial and punitive, often alienating local populations from legal outcomes and eroding traditional conflict resolution mechanisms.

VI. EFFECTS ON INDIGENOUS STRUCTURES AND RESISTANCE

Okonkwo noticed the impact of colonialism quickly because he had been in exile. As a previous village leader he had often gone against village values but did believe in them. Colonialism also seemed to take his son away from him. He initially tried to resist colonialism before falling into despair.

The loss of political autonomy led to deep societal fragmentation. Okonkwo's resistance to colonial rule, culminating in his suicide, symbolizes the tragic collapse of a way of life. His death represents not only personal despair but also the collective powerlessness of his people in the face of imperial domination. The new government marginalized traditional leaders and created new power dynamics based on loyalty to the colonizers.

The fictional Igbo village of Umuofia is portrayed with a rich and complex system of traditional governance. Far from being lawless or primitive, Umuofia's political and social structures reflect deep-rooted customs, spiritual beliefs, and communal values. The writer uses the society of Umuofia to challenge colonial narratives and emphasize on pre-colonial African institutions.

Achebe illustrates how the introduction of colonial institutions created cultural dislocation and societal fragmentation. Characters such as Okonkwo struggle to adapt, while the community's traditional bonds weaken under the pressure of foreign authority. The shift in legal and governmental systems was not merely administrative but represented a profound epistemological rupture.

VII. PSYCHOLOGICAL IMPACT AND RESISTANCE

Okonkwo's tragic arc symbolizes the psychological turmoil induced by colonial disruption. His resistance is both personal and cultural; however, his suicide is an abomination in Igbo belief and signifies the ultimate breakdown of the old order. Achebe portrays resistance not merely as physical opposition but as a deeper struggle to preserve identity in the face of cultural erasure. Frantz F. in The Wretched of the Earth (1963): Discusses the psychological and political effects of colonialism, relevant to understanding the loss of indigenous governance.

VIII. DISCUSSION

The story follows Okonkwo, a respected leader and warrior in the Igbo village of Umuofia. He is determined to rise above the shame of his lazy, indebted father, Unoka. Okonkwo is known for his strength, masculinity, and pride. He earns titles and respect, but his rigid beliefs and fear of weakness often lead to harsh decisions.

Tragedy strikes when Okonkwo accidentally kills a clansman and is exiled for seven years. During his exile, European missionaries arrive in Umuofia and begin to convert many villagers, disrupting traditional customs and beliefs.

When Okonkwo returns, he finds his village changed. The colonial government has established courts and authority, undermining the Igbo way of life. Okonkwo tries to rally the villagers to resist but finds that most have accepted the new order. In despair and realizing that resistance is futile, Okonkwo takes his own life an act considered an abomination in his culture.

IX. CONCLUSION

In the novel Things Fall Apart, Achebe is presenting the remaining of a seminal text in postcolonial literature, offering critical insight into the processes and effects of cultural disruption caused by European colonialism. The novel challenges monolithic colonial narratives and foregrounds the resilience and tragedy of indigenous societies in transition.

The arrival of Europeans in Umuofia marked the beginning of a new governmental order, the one that dismantled indigenous structures and imposed a centralized, colonial bureaucracy. Achebe's novel captures the cultural disintegration and psychological trauma accompanying this transformation. The sociopolitical consequences continue to echo in post-colonial studies, making Things Fall Apart a foundational text in understanding the impact of colonialism on African governance.

The legal and governmental transformation depicted in Things Fall Apart reveals the broader dynamics of colonial imposition and indigenous resistance. Understanding these institutional differences is critical not only for literary analysis but also for historical and anthropological studies of colonial impact. Achebe's work serves as both a narrative of cultural collapse and a critique of the systems that precipitated it.

Umuofia's traditional governance in Things Fall Apart is not just a backdrop for the story; it's a vibrant example of a pre-colonial African society with order, accountability, and a deep sense of justice. Achebe's portrayal invites readers to respect and understand African institutions on their own terms, rather than through colonial lenses. Through Umuofia, he affirms the value and complexity of indigenous governance that was disrupted but not erased by colonialism.

REFERENCES

[1]. CHINUA, A. (1958) Things Fall Apart. London: Heinemann.
[2]. FRANTZ, F. (1963) The Wretched of the Earth. Nairobi: Grove Press.
[3]. MBEMBE, A. (2001*) On the Post colony*. New York: University of California Press.
[4]. MAMDANI, M. (1996). Citizen and Subject: Contemporary Africa and the Legacy of Late Colonialism. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
[5]. NGUGI wa THIONGO. (1986*) Decolonizing the mind.* Nairobi: the new press.
[6]. NZEGWU, N. (2006). Family Matters: Feminist Concepts in African Philosophy of Culture. Nairobi: SUNY Press.
[7]. TYSON, L. (2006). Critical theory today, A User- Friendly Guide. Second edition New York: Routledge.
[8]. YAA, G. (2016*) Homegoing*, New York: Alfred a. knopf.